Deconstructing the "Obsession" Narrative: A Longitudinal Sentiment Analysis of Donald Trump in Canadian Media

Abstract

This report investigates the prevailing "meme" that Canadian media is existentially obsessed with Donald Trump. Utilizing the Internet Archive CDX API [1], we analyzed 20,372 initial articles, filtering down to a core corpus of 1,386 high-relevance pieces. Using local LLM-based sentiment analysis (Gemma 3:4b), we find that while Canada's National Observer maintains a high-volume, critical stance, this "obsession" is not a systemic trend across the Canadian media landscape. Rather, mainstream outlets exhibit a "reactive engagement" model, covering the subject only during major political shocks, thereby refuting the "leftist propaganda" buyout narrative.

1 Introduction: The "Obsession" Hypothesis

It is a common refrain in certain digital corridors that Canadian newsrooms are "bought out" by interests dedicated to anti-Trump propaganda. This paper seeks to quantify this alleged obsession. If the hypothesis were true, we would expect to see a consistent, high-volume, negative baseline across the entire ideological spectrum of Canadian news.

1.1 Source Selection & The Data Funnel

We selected three outlets widely cited as among the most trusted and ideologically representative in Canada [2, 3]: Ottawa Sun (Populist/Right), CTV News (Establishment/Centrist), and Canada's National Observer (Investigative/Left). This left–centre–right spread allows us to test whether "obsession" with Trump is systemic or concentrated in one segment of the media landscape.

Table 1: The Reality Filter: From Raw Data to Relevant Discourse

Stage	Article Count
Total Archived Articles (Noise)	20,372
Keyword Search: "Trump" (Potential Interest)	2,209
Mentions of Donald Trump in news (incl. listicles and summary articles)	2,101
Articles about Donald Trump	1,386

2 Analysis: Sentiment & Volume

2.1 Theme 1: The Volume Illusion

Think Tank Insight: The 10% Reality

Out of over 20,000 articles captured in the archive, only 2,209 even mentioned the word "Trump." This represents roughly 10.8% of the total news output. If Canadian media were truly "obsessed," one would expect a figure closer to the saturation levels seen in US-based cable news. The data suggests Trump is a significant topic, but far from the only topic.

2.2 Theme 2: The National Observer Anomaly

As shown in Figure 2, the volume is heavily skewed toward Canada's National Observer. Figure 3 complements raw counts by normalizing outlet volume, showing that cross-outlet tone differences persist even after accounting for the Observer's much larger output.

Sociological Perspective: Why the Observer?

The National Observer accounts for the lion's share of our filtered corpus (n=1,364). Critics point to this as "propaganda," but a sociological analysis suggests Editorial Niche Congruence. The Observers core mandate is environmental reporting and climate policyareas where the Trump administration's deregulatory agenda posed a direct existential threat to the outlet's primary beat. Their "obsession" is not a leftist conspiracy, but a logical focus on the most significant global antagonist to their specific policy interests.

2.3 Theme 3: Mainstream Apathy

In contrast to the Observer, the Ottawa Sun and CTV News show remarkably low volumes in the filtered set. Taken together, Figures 4 and 5 suggest a persistent negative tilt across years, but with noticeable event-driven spikes rather than a perfectly smooth ideological baseline.

Analysis: Countering the "Bought Out" Narrative

If the Canadian media were a monolith of anti-Trump propaganda, we would see CTV and the Ottawa Sun mirroring the Observers volume. Instead, we see Event-Driven Coverage. Mainstream Canadian media treats Trump like a blizzard: they report on him when hes happening (trade deals, elections, scandals), but they dont go looking for him in the off-season. The Suns higher neutral rating (46.2%) further suggests that the "propaganda" label fails to stick to more populist, right-leaning outlets.

2.4 Theme 4: Headline Salience

Figures 6 and 7 provide a useful check against simple mention counts: many stories discuss Trump in context, but only a subset make him the headline-level focal point.

3 Discussion: The "Shade of the Elephant" Effect

The data indicates that the perceived "obsession" is a result of vocal minority reporting. Because the National Observer is an investigative outlet that publishes frequently on policy, their digital footprint is disproportionately large in sentiment datasets.

For the average Canadian news consumer (CTV/Sun), Trump is a figure of "The American Spectacle"a neighbor whose loud arguments can be heard through the walls, but not someone who dominates the daily household chores. The "Leftist Buyout" theory is mathematically undermined by the relative silence of the mainstream Canadian press compared to the hyper-focused investigative niche of the Observer.

4 Conclusion

While sentiment remains net-negative across the board, this reflects a standard Canadian "middle-power" caution toward disruptive US foreign policy rather than a coordinated propaganda campaign. We conclude that Canada is not "obsessed" with Trump; rather, one specific, environmentally-focused outlet is highly attentive to him, while the rest of the media landscape covers him with the same professional detachment they might afford a distant forest fire: with concern, but only when the smoke reaches the border.
